In the Meiji period, Japan didn't have railway technology. So, Edmund Morel came from the U.K. to Japan and taught Japanese engineers how to build railways. He got sick and died in 1871, but the first railway was opened in Japan the next year. It was 29 kilometers long, and it took 53 minutes to travel from Shimbashi to Yokohama. Trains were very useful because they could carry a lot of people and cargo at the same time. As a result, railways were built across Japan one after another.

After World War II, the economy grew and the population increased in Japan. To carry more people and cargo quickly, the government decided to build a new railway between Tokyo and Osaka by the Tokyo Olympics. At that time, the old Tokaido Line took 6 hours and 50 minutes to travel from Tokyo to Osaka. The chief engineer Hideo Shima solved many problems and built the new railway in just 5 years. It was opened between Tokyo and Shin-Osaka on October 1st, 1964. It was named the Tokaido Shinkansen and became the first high-speed railway in the world.

October 1st, 2024 was the 60th anniversary of the Tokaido Shinkansen. When it was first opened, it took 4 hours to travel from Tokyo to Shin-Osaka. Now, it takes only 2 hours and 21 minutes. For 60 years, 6.8 billion people have used the Tokaido Shinkansen. Railways in Japan were developed rapidly over the past 150 years.
